

Planning Your College Essay

The Big Picture

Writing your college essay is no different than writing any other essay. It must be focused, clear, engaging, compelling, and personal (meaning it reveals something about you—not that it must contain excessive personal details!). As you plan, keep in mind that admissions officers are reading thousands of essays. They have heard every travel story, life changing volunteer experience, and challenging situation in the book. What will make your essay stand out more than anything else is the quality, clarity and focus of your writing. Above all—the essay must leave the admissions officer feeling as if they know YOU better than he/she did before they read it.

Step 1: How to get started

- 1) Read the essay question carefully and think: “What is this asking me to write about?” You can be creative to some extent of course, but ultimately you must address the precise question asked.
- 2) Brainstorm some possible experiences or events in your life that might lend themselves to answering the question. This does not have to be some “huge event” (travel abroad, dramatic situation, etc). Often the best essays are about everyday life or habits, and writing about a “huge event” often ends up being more about the event than about YOU.

Step 2: What’s the big takeaway?

- 1) Determine 2-3 of the experiences/events that seem particularly compelling.
- 2) Think: “Based on the question I’m answering, and the experience I’ve chosen to write about, what is the one big takeaway that I want my admissions officer to have after reading this?”
 - a. Note: this step is absolutely critical. If you can’t summarize the main idea/major takeaway of your essay in 1 sentence or less, then chances are you need to narrow your idea down.
 - b. Make sure your “big takeaway” reveals something important about you and not about the experience/event. (I.e. a big takeaway must let the admissions officer understand you better as a person—if you are writing about a trip abroad, your essay can’t just be about how cool it was to go abroad—that doesn’t teach the admissions officer anything about you!)
- 3) You should have a list of 2-3 possible essay topics along with a 1 sentence or shorter “big takeaway” summary for each. Now think—are any of these “speaking to me” more than others?

Step 3: Put Pencil to Paper!

- 1) Start with a free-flowing brainstorm—what are your strongest memories about this event/experience? What impact has it had on you? Why is it important? What does it show about you? I recommend pencil and paper here—go old fashioned to capture ALL your thoughts.
- 2) Review your notes to find the most compelling ideas and snippets about this experience/event. Use these to create a rough outline of your essay.
- 3) Get writing! Don’t agonize over starting with a perfect catchy line—if you are struggling to get started, begin with your body paragraphs, and then go back to the opening later.
